WHO STARTED PROPAGANDA?

Truth About Blue Laws to Be Told at Third Presbyterian.

Facts which every Christian and patriotic citizen should know will be given in the Third Presbyterian church Sunday night at 7:30 o'clock on "The Truth About the Blue Law Propaganda." Who started this propaganda and why is the question that will be answered.

Some big plain facts about the powerful attempts to commercialize Sunday and enslave multitudes of workers with unnecessary Sunday toil will be presented.

The speakers who will deliver the messages are Arthur Bartelt, first assistant district attorney of Milwaukee and a commissioner to the general assembly; the Rev. H. L. Bolby, D. D., general secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance, who has been leading the movement against the propagandists and who will bring some late data on the subject, and the Rev. W. H. Whallon, D. D., pastor of the Central Presbyterian church of Zanesville, O., whose men's organization is the largest in the Presbyterian church.

The pastor of the Third church, the Rev. H. B. Hostetter, stated today that the meeting would be open to all and that the public is invited to attend.

The Rev. H. McAfee Robinson, of Philadelphia, will be the speaker in the Third church tomorrow morning.

BEAUTY CHATS

by EDNA KENT FORBES

PRACTICING COMMON WORDS.

Perhaps the two most important things to remember in cultivating the voice are persistance and patience. Spasmodic efforts are of little use in this as in any other treatment for self-improvement.

In the matter of the voice, practice—which is another way of saying persistance—is most important of all. When you have listened for vocal flaws, and while you are taking exercises to overcome these faults, give a little extra time to the more common faults. For instance, take a list of the words you use most.

"Yes," "no," "the," "and" are four words that come in again and again, in almost every sentence you utter. And they are among the most abused words in our language. Do you by any chance say "yeh" for "yes"? Or do you happen to pronounce "no" as though it were "naw"? Written out so, it looks like a glaring fault which anyone would resent if accused of it. But if you will listen, you will find that the very nicest people have slipped into it.

"And" is particularly abused. It is often slurred into "an" or, worse yet, deprived of even its first letter and pronounced simply "n"—a single letter slid between two words of a hastily spoken sentence. "The" is not so badly slurred. "And" suffers more than any other words, unless it happens to be "yes."

These are small points, but they make such a difference in one's manner, they add or detract so from the good impression one always wants to make, that they are well worth paying attention to.

J. E. M.—Lemon juice and baking soda will do to keep your daughter's hair light. Two tablespoonsful of the former, one-third of a teaspoonful of soda, to a quart of water, used as the final rinse after the shampoo. Hot crude oil massaged into the scalp the night before the shampoo will correct this dry condition, which is causing those flakes through the hair.

Irene—You should consult some other doctor who will give you the proper interest in your case. A condition such as yours can sometimes be traced to extreme nervousness, though it looked as if it was a case of eczema. External treatment can only relieve it.

P. E. G.—The growth of hair did not come from using peroxide. There is no objection to using lemon juice and ammonia together, if it is not too irritating to the skin.

Rosie—Hot water opens the pores, cold water closes them. If you use the former, be sure to dash cold water over your face and neck to close the pores again. Wrinkles do not come from either.

A winning personality comes through a desire to help others. It is acquired through the practice of this loving art.

All inquiries addressed to Miss Forbes in care of the "Beauty Chats" department will be answered in these columns in their turn. This requires considerable time, however, owing to the great number received. So if a personal or quicker reply is desired, a stamped and self-addressed envelope must be enclosed with the question.—The Editor.

European Travel Today

(By Frederic J. Haskin)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 21.—After six lean years, Europe is again to entertain the American tourist on a large and lavish scale. School teachers, students, literati, and all the other types of travelers are planning to spend their money abroad this summer.

The reasons are several. To the usual cultural advantages of European travel there are now added the attractions of alcohol, and the rates of exchange which make the American dollar look considerably larger than it does in this country. Also, Europe has changed in the years of war, and many people who would never care to view the same landmark or scenic effect twice are going over again to bring their conversation up-to-date. Finally, business men are said to be less rushed with work this year, so that they have time to run over to Europe as they used to do in the days of normalcy.

Altogether, Europe is going to be popular again. It is difficult now to book passage on the big steamers for any time this summer. In fact, far-sighted people tell us they began to make arrangements for this year's vacation as soon as they unpacked their trunks at home last September.

The steamship companies go so far as to claim that Europe will receive more tourists this summer than in 1913. And even at that the number will be limited by the shipping facilities. The companies are not in a position to add to their passenger fleets materially this year. They, as well as European business men, have had reason to regret the suspension of tourist transportation. Their ships have been used as cattle boats, freighters and transports. This has meant expensive repairs in almost every case before the ship could be used for passenger accommodation again. To take one instance, the Aeolus, which was converted into a freighter, is said to have been laid up nine months in drydock for repairs aggregating $3,000,000.

Passages High.

Those prospective tourists who are promised passage this summer are no doubt concluding that Europe may be cheaper to travel in than this country, but an ocean voyage tends to gobble up the difference. First class passage that once cost $120 now sells for about $250, and other rates are correspondingly elevated.

Passports, too, seem to have acquired lasting favor with governments as revenue material, and are still demanded of tourists at the remunerative rate, to the government, of $10 per, red tape thrown in. Passport red tape is not so rigorous and tiresome as it has been, though it still takes two or three weeks to obtain papers.

Once the tourist gets to Europe, he may or may not be able to save any money. England is notably an expensive place now, even with the English pound worth a little less than $3, instead of its normal $4.86. According to the department of commerce, living costs in England have not fallen to any extent since the war. A few commodities tend to drop as in this country, but to offset the reductions rents have risen and travel is more expensive with no immediate prospect of much lower fares.

In Norway and Sweden, likewise, the rate of exchange is not sufficiently in our favor to do more than offset the heavy increases in living costs. Economy for the traveler is impossible, we are told, in northern Europe.

As for Switzerland and France, an experienced traveler, recently returned, says that these countries offer satisfactory accommodations in the first class hotels, and with the franc at a little over eight cents instead of nineteen, the American has a distinct advantage. He thinks, however, that it is not possible to expect to save money even here. The first class hotels have been renovated and are as good as they ever were. But when it comes to the pensions or boarding houses, the situation is different from in the old days. Before the war it was possible to obtain a room and excellent meals in a Swiss pension for aslow as one dollar a day. Now the rate is higher, and the food is very different. Butter and meat are scarce. Coarse bread is served. Economy is still rampant in these small hostelries, just as it is in private homes.

Italy is looked to by many of the tourists as the place where the American eagles will scream the loudest. And this is no doubt true. Passenger rates have increased over 200 percent and hotel and restaurant prices are 200 and 300 percent higher. But the lira has decreased 400 percent, so that it is worth only five cents against its standard value of 19 cents.

Hospitable Italy.

Italy is said to be in good shape to receive visitors. Hotels have been done over and many supplied with the American luxuries of modern heating plants and bathing facilities.

In general, the traveler may expect to find that while travel in Europe is cheaper than travel in this country, it is every bit as expensive as staying at home. Everywhere the tourist goes, there are unexpected demands for money. Taxes are as prevalent there as here. The luxury tax is even extended in some places to take in meals on trains and in restaurants. While in Germany, a foreigner is regarded as a source of taxation merely because he is a foreigner. His meals are higher, and he is taxed wherever he goes as an exotic, unnecessary being.

Except for the Rhineland and other parts in allied control, Gegmany is not an easy country now for the tourist to visit. In fact, all of the central European countries offer more difficulties in the way of passports and vises and they are not reorganized for the tourist trade as western Europe is.

Belgium, France and Italy have pulled themselves together for visitors more rapidly than it was thought possible they could. Much of the railroad tracking wrecked during the war has been rebuilt, and trains have been renovated. The battlefields have been made easily accessible by trains and bus lines, and inns and hotels have sprung up all along the routes. Souvenirs, post cards, everything that the tourist used to want, is again on sale.

Bargains in these things are scarcely to be expected. The tourist everywhere is always a legitimate prey for the natives. Last year the French dealers and inn-keepers put up their prices so needlessly that the French government sent out a notice—"Don't treat the tourists as some of you treated the American soldiers." In justice, however, it should be said that there have been tourists who did not hesitate to pass off cigar coupons for American paper money on unsuspecting peasants.

Before the war, American sightseers were spending $175,000,000 in Europe every year. The loss of this has made a large hole in the pockets of tradespeople and guides, who depended on the tourists for their living. Now, they expect a return of the old reckless spending. And they will probably not hope in vain. The tourists are coming.

Clover Makes Unusual Growth.

(Special to the News.)

HICKSVILLE, O., May 20.—Charles Sinn, who lives northeast of here, has a three acre tract of crimson clover out in full bloom, that is attracting a lot of attention from farmers. This particular kind is a rarety in this section, and the mildness of the past winter has made the heavy growth possible in this climate at this season.

As Woman to Woman

By SIDNEY LEAR.

MOTHER'S VANITY MADE POOR LITTLE BABY SUFFER

Having Dressed Here All Up in Uncomfortable Splendor, She Promenaded Her Until She Was Exhausted and Cranky.

The Saturday afternoon strollers walked along basking in the sunshine and the admiration of other strollers.

To baby, holding mother's hand and gazing up at the passing crowd, it seemed like a huge wave sweeping her on, whether she wanted to go or not.

She had been trotting along for so many blocks and the pavement was getting so hard and poundy!

The little black patent leather slippers that she wore were not meant for long-distance walking.

The white stockings were getting all bedraggled and dusty as her short legs toiled on, making no headway against that overwhelming mass of humanity above and around her.

But mother pushed forward, leaning over now and then to give a proud look at baby.

Trolleys passed them all the time, but there was never a thought in mother's mind of taking that means of getting up the street.

No, indeed, she had brought baby out to be seen, and she was going to have her seen.

For baby was all dolled up.

An embroidered white dress, with a ruffled sweater of light blue yarn, and a big blue bonnet edged, trimmed and tied under the chin with blue satin ribbon.

You could hardly see the tired little face, hidden, as it was, in the depths of the stagey hat.

But you could tell how weary it must look from the draggy way in which baby was beginning to pull those thinly clad feet after her.

She was tired!

No doubt mother had a difficult time before she got home that night.

Probably you rode on the same trolley with her and saw her yank baby up the steps and into the car.

"You just wait till I get you home!" you probably heard her say in threatening tones.

And you probably heard baby's tired, insistent wail, whining about standing up on the seat, wanting to get down on the floor, howling because she couldn't sit in mother's lap.

And you wondered why in the world mother didn't keep that "dressed up brat" quiet.

Well, that was the reason; it was all mother's vanity.

She was so proud of baby, so proud of her handiwork (for she must have made the sweater and trimmed the hat herself), that she dragged poor little baby all those blocks just to show her off!

Then when baby had become so exhausted that she could scarcely step she had whisked her off into a crowded trolley car, without giving her anything to satisfy the appetite stirred up by that long walk—and expected her to keep quiet.

Why, if you were so tired you couldn't see straight and half dizzy from seeing so many people swishing past you; anyhow, worn out from promenading slowly, without any chance to play, and so hungry that dry bread would taste good—wouldn't you be cranky?

When you know both sides of the question it really seems as if mother should be the one to suffer for the experience and baby the one to say, "Just wait till I get you home!"

For, after all, who started it all?

Q. What proportion of the men employed by mines actually work underground? Q. E. D.

A. In bituminous mines four-fifths of the employes are under ground, directly engaged in getting out the coal. In anthracite mines, about one-third of the men are actualy mining coal, the rest being occupied in preparing and moving it.

Q. Can a branch of an apple tree be grafted on a pear tree and the branch bear apples and the pear tree bear pears? M. B.

A. The Department of Agriculture says that although it is true that a branch of the apple tree can be grafted to a pear tree and the branch have apples and the pear tree have pears, this is not common and is simply rgarded as a curiosity. Such a method of propagation has no practical possibilities.

Q. Was Father Frobel a Catholic? Did he name his school "kindergarten"? P. F. N.

A. Friedrich Frobel, the founder of the kindergarten system, was a Lutheran, not a Roman Catholic. He was born in 1782, but it was not until 1816 or 1817 that he decided to devote himself to work along educational lines. It was not until 1836 or 1837 that he gave the name "kindergarten to the system of teaching children which he had gradually developed.

Q. What is the procedure in water-proofing a tent? A. P. L.

A. The department of agriculture says that here is very little milk held in the udder at the beginnig of the milking process. The milk is made largely during the proces of milking.

Q. When were combs first used? M. V. T.

A. There are records to show that combs have been used from the remotest times. They were an article of adornment in ancient Greece and Rome. Ivory combs were common among the Egyptians. They have also been found in Anglo-Saxon graves.

Q. Please tell me if there is a place called "Avalon". K. C.

A. Avalon is a legendary island, to which King Arthur was supposed to have been conveyed after being wounded in his last battle. It has been identified with various places, notably Glastonbury and Somersetshire. Avalon is probably merely the old Celtic representation of Paradise, or the "Happy other world."

CHAPTER XLIII

False Safety.

Captain Frazier left me in the lobby of the hotel. I knew that my late appearance would pass for an all-night ball with the hotel staff, but I felt a slight apprehension for an explanation to Paul in case his anxiety should have kept him up and he had witnessed my arrival with Captain Frazier after I had assured him that the dashing officer would not be present at Fan's party. If he had called Fan——

Fortunately my fears were groundless. The apartment was wrapped in silence when I let myself noiselessly in and stopping outside Paul's door, I heard his deep regular breathing.

I slipped into my room and drew a breath of relief. Although I had a tremendously strenuous day, I felt little fatigue but a strange mental exhilaration. The tragic story Mrs. Carlton had told me, the masterful lovemaking of Captain Frazier, and the clean youthful appearance of Gerry Williams claimed my imagination in turn.

I put on a negligee and drew the chaise longue to the window. A soft breeze fluttered the curtains and the spreading crimson in the east cast a roseate glow over the roof tops revealed in the increasing light.

Two things stood out saliently in the night's events. One was Elizabeth Carlton's story which, she had told, though it hurt her horribly, that I might read in it a warning. And I had gone directly out and let myself in for the very set of incriminating circumstances which she had deplored. Suppose someone had seen Dick Frazier and me emerge from that studio apartment together! I had left Fan's without telling of my proposal visit to Mrs. Carlton. If Paul had seen me return——

I dismissed the hypothesis with a shrug. It hadn't happened and even if it had, "Trust Nell to get herself out of a jam." I laughed softly to myself.

Obeying my theatrical instinct to act even without an audience, I sprang up and lifted my arms to the new day.

"There is no man in the world that I can't handle!" I whispered the challenge of Fate.

But in my heart I felt a slight misgiving at the memory of Dick Frazier. Violet Crossley had spoken truly when she said: "He kissed me—I will remember it on my wedding day." There was an uncanny fascination about the man. He had that disconcerting faculty of making a woman act against her will and glorying in it. Perhaps it was just as well that I was leaving town for a few weeks, I reflected.

When I broke the news to Paul after dinner the next day, he consented readily.

"The rest will do you good. You're looking tired today."

"I shouldn't. I slept till teatime after my dissipation last night."

"It must have been a late party. I didn't hear you come in. Shall I wire for your hotel reservations, tonight?"

"Please. And do try to run down sometimes. We'll need some diversion, Elizabeth Carlton and I."

Paul grinned.

"You'll have a different cavalier each evening, so don't try to placate me with any lonesome stuff. But try to get some rest, Nell, you've been looking rather fagged the past few days."

"Don't tell me that!" I cried sharply. "I loathe being told that I don't look well. It has a bad psychological effect."

"Besides being a beastly blow to her poor little vanity, eh?"

"I think you're s-so unkind—" I began and to my own surprise felt the tears rising.

It was an interesting phenomenon. I had never cried before a man in my life. I decided to carry it through since it promised a new weapon. So I let a tear or two trickle down my cheek, very carefully, so as not to damage my complexion.

"Why, sweetheart, what is it?" cried Paul, springing up and coming to me. "Don't cry, dearest! I'm a brute to have hurt you! I never realized you cared so much about your looks."

"I only w-want to be p-pretty for you", I sobbed, beginning to enjoy the novelty.

"You will always be beautiful to me in spite of time or circumstances," said Paul solemnly. And once again I took a scared promise lightly.
